"A Beautiful Day to Die!"

SATURDAY 25 MAY 2019

Saturday 25 May 1945 was the most beautiful day of Rebecca Ashford's life. Just a week ago, Robert Peacock had finally been demobbed from the army and today they had spent a blissful day together for the first time in three years whilst he had been serving in the Far East. And then to complete her happiness, he had totally unexpectedly proposed to her and placed the most perfect diamond ring on her finger. Now, bubbling with excitement, she was on the way to Bridgnorth, accompanied by Robert, to inform her parents.

But others on the train that evening were not in such good spirits. For some, the immediate aftermath of war had not brought joy and happiness and perhaps that made it hard for them to accept those whose happiness was all too evident. Suffice to say that, for whatever reason, it can never truly be a beautiful day to die!"

It is fortunate then that a Detective Inspector Alfred Crowther should be boarding the train at Bridgnorth after a long and tedious day at Brignorth Police Station, on his way home to Arley. Unfortunately for him is the fact that a policeman is never truly off duty and, confronted with a murder, he has no alternative to taking charge and commencing an investigation. You may rest assured that the Inspector will leave no stone unturned as he questions the suspects which will eventually lead him to the apprehension of the perpetrator of this heinous crime.
